COCOS ISLAND

One small Pacific island became a treasure bank for a string of pirates and a magnet for treasure hunters. Cocos Island 500 km off Costa Rica, Central America, has been used by at least three pirates for hiding treasure. Treasure hunters are still drawn to the island, hoping that some of its riches can still be found.

In the 1680s, the English pirate Edward Davies used Cocos as a base for his ship, the Bachelor's Delight. He would attack passing ships and raid coastal towns returning to the thickly-wooded island to store his treasure. No one knows if he collected it all before his mysterious disappearance in 1702.

In 1819, a Portuguese pirate named Benito Bonito carried out a raid on the Mexican port of Acapulco, making off with a cargo of gold and silver coins. He too headed for Cocos Island, hiding his treasure in an area known as Wafer Bay. Two years later, Bonito was killed in a fight, leaving only a confusing map to indicate where the treasure might be.

The biggest haul of all was left by a Scottish sailor, William Thompson. During a revolution in 1821, the government of Peru hired him to carry their most valuable treasures to Panama to keep them safe. Thompson promptly stole them and buried them on Cocos Island.

The rulers of Peru forced him to take them back to the spot where he had buried the treasure, but he escaped and hid on the island until they had left. He was rescued by a passing ship, and planned to come back to collect the treasure. But he never made it. On his deathbed, he told a friend, John Keating, where the loot could be found.

Many attempts have been made to track down the Cocos Island treasure - some more successful than others. In 1880, Benito Bonito's map fell into the hands of a German sailor, August Gissler, who realized that the island on the map must be Cocos. Gissler spent nearly 20 years searching the island. All he found was one single doubloon (a Spanish gold coin), and he died in poverty.

In 1846, John Keating, who had been given William Thompson's treasure map, set sail for Cocos with a companion named Boag. They found the cave Thompson had described, with a hoard of treasure which included a life-size solid gold statue. But when they returned to their ship, the crew demanded a large share of the loot and threatened violence. Keating and Boag jumped overboard and swam to the island to escape. The sailors searched in vain for the treasure, then sailed away, leaving the two men behind. Boag died, but Keating escaped on a passing whaling ship. No one knows what he took with him, but he lived the rest of his life a wealthy man, returning to Cocos several times before his death in 1882. He left his widow clues about how to find the treasure cave, but she was never able to decode them.

Other treasure hunters have scoured Cocos, but with little success. However, in 1966, a French team found fifteen gold bars and some gold coins. Nearby lay two skeletons, one with an axe clasped in one hand and a knife between its ribs, the other with a large hole in its skull. Two treasure hunters had obviously killed each other in their desperation to grab the loot for themselves.
